The Gift Idea Under $100 For Campers And Preppers

The ultra-efficient solar lantern, flashlight, and power bank that provides light when the power is out or you go offline

Palo Alto, CA (November 5, 2019) — Any camping enthusiast or emergency prepper can always use a good flashlight and the holiday time is a great time to give them one of the best, HELIO. Not only is it a flashlight that is powered from the sun – a 1 watt solar panel stores energy in a 5,200 mAH lithium-ion battery – it features a lantern and a USB output to charge other portable devices.

Prepping for emergencies? Anyone can appreciate the portable power generating capabilities of HELIO. With power outages becoming commonplace due to weather incidents or wildfire avoidance, having backup lighting is essential and with HELIO, that backup lighting can also generate electricity to keep you powered through many days.

The portability of HELIO means that it is a great addition to the Go Bag that many people keep at the ready in case of quick evacuation. It is best to keep HELIO near sunlight so it is fully charged when the need to go arises.

Joe Cain, President of Makers4Good, HELIO's manufacturers, states, "many people keep a HELIO on their window sill – either in their kitchen or bedroom, or both – that way it is easy to find and remains fully charged from the sunshine."

Gift giving for camping gear enthusiasts can be difficult if they seem to have everything already. HELIO is a sure bet to create a pleasant surprise and prove to be a useful tool anywhere off the grid.

HELIO is also a gift that keeps on giving. All profits – 100% – are donated to non-profit organizations. Most of these non-profits are focused on delivering energy solutions to those currently living without reliable grid access worldwide.

More information about HELIO can be found at the website HELIO.energy.
